

Adrienne Davenport's Bio

A dedicated writer long before her first book was published, Adrienne Davenport knew her true calling as far back as sixth grade.

What began as an assignment to write a short story and draw illustrations to go with ballooned into a small work of medieval romance, quintessentially titled "A Fairytale". Transformed into a homemade book by her teacher, the work still sits in her desk drawer, a true reminder of the beginning of her passion for reading and writing romance. Often the writer can be found telling of late nights spent hiding under her covers reading novels by Judith McNaught and Nora Roberts while her parents slept across the hall, unaware of their thirteen-year-olds antics.

Further inspired by these two authors, Adrienne spent most of her high school years writing poetry and studying the mechanics that drove the world of published authors. In 2012 she published her first novel, Dishonorable Intentions. The historical romance received rave reviews from multiple bestselling authors. Adrienne has since written three more novels.

A single mom living with her son and father in the beautiful tourist trap, Moab, Utah Adrienne loves the magnetic energy created by the variety of people that spill into the town throughout the year. A woman of many interests, she divides her spare time between her family and a diverse range of activities. Driven by her inherent love of life in general as well as an endless hunger to be creative, Adrienne is currently working on her fifth romantic novel.
